

OHIO TEAM SUCCESSFUL PLAY IS RUNNING PASS

(Associated Press)
COLUMBUS, Ohio, Dec. 29.—Aerial attack, or the forward passing style of play, has been developed to a greater stage of perfection by Ohio State university's football team than by any eleven in the country, according to football experts, and it is on this form of offensive that the Buckeyes will depend for victory when they face the University of California team at the Tournament of Roses at Pasadena, California, on New Year's day.

Only one team in the middle West, Notre Dame, could be considered as even a rival of Ohio State in forward pass plays, and most football experts consider the Ohio pass superior even to those of the late George Gipp, Notre Dame's star hurler, primarily because Ohio State is adept at every type of pass—whether running, standing, double, triple or even of the "screen" type.

Two men form the nucleus of Ohio State's aerial attack: Horace Workman, 29-year-old quarterback, who last fall played his first season on the team, and "Pete" Stinchcomb, who made the mythical all-American team.

Workman is the most accurate passer seen in the middle west since the overhead attack was made legal. His throws from any position and any distance and nearly always gets the ball within reaching distance of the receiving player, whether that player be running or standing still.

Stinchcomb's greatest work is in receiving passes. He is the fastest man on the team and gets many yards down the field before Workman is ready to throw.

Stinchcomb takes the ball while traveling at full speed and if Workman's pass does not happen to be a little wide, Stinchcomb generally is able to get to it before it reaches the ground. Once he has the ball, the little halfback has better than an even chance for a long run, for his dodging, twisting and side-stepping make him an almost impossible man to stop.

Nearly all of the Ohio passes are played from a punt formation, but the team runs so many other plays from this formation that it is impossible for the opponents to "lay possible for the opponents to "lay" for the passes. Line bucks and runs and off-tackle dashes all may be started from a kicking arrangement.

Probably the most successful play of the Ohio State team is the running pass, for in this play it is optional with the passer to buck through the line, circle end or pass the ball. Workman, in the kicker's position, receives the ball and with his backfield as interference starts around end. Stinchcomb, through his great speed, easily outdistances the interference and gets far ahead. Then, with Stinchcomb, the other two backs, and Workman, who trails behind, cutting a wide circle around end, the play is in full swing and it depends on the immediate circumstances whether it is a run or a pass. If the chances are good for a gain, Workman continues with the ball. If he is about to be tackled, the quarterback leaps high in the air and throws to Stinchcomb while still on the run, the latter receiving without stopping, or else turns completely around and hurls to the other end. It is the most beautiful play in football and never fails to bring cheers even from the opposition grandstand when successful.

The standing pass is somewhat different. From the same kicking formation Workman receives the ball. Stinchcomb circles end, but Workman simply steps back toward his own goal with the other two backs protecting him. With this interference he frequently waits many seconds before passing. When he finally has picked out a receiver, the ball is lined to him. This play, however, is more dangerous than the running pass, for if no receiver is available Workman is almost sure to be thrown for a 10 or 15-yard loss unless he can dodge through for a few yards.

A few double and triple passes are used by Ohio State, but primarily the aerial attack depends on the running standing or screen passes. All passes vary in length, sometimes being only a few yards and at other times traveling half the length of the field.
